HyperMotion Technology will make it easier for players to use all the tools and techniques that change the way a player can control the ball, dictate play with positional creativity and make essential decisions on the pitch. For example, a player may be dribbling through the opposition's defensive line, but a devious sliding move or a clever pass will split the defense and create space for a teammate to get back onside. As the game starts to accelerate and the pace of the action increases, real-life player decisions become more difficult to make and their reaction time must also increase. As a result, very precise control is required to execute a good pass or take a shot with accuracy. A complex gameplay mechanic that takes this precision even further is the dribble, where players can no longer simply run at pace, but must make cutting, accurate darting turns and explosive accelerations to open up space and get into scoring positions. In the past, the models that play FIFA were based on a player with 70 percent body fat, which was the average recorded body fat at an international level. Now we have created a model with a body fat percentage of 13 percent. This move means that we are much closer to a player's actual performance and we believe that this will help improve the authenticity of players' movement. Even with the new HyperMotion technology, players can still make the same perfect passes as before as the data from the game remains the same. There is still a strong need to use the ball precisely because it will be so easy to score from difficult positions. FIFA is the oldest and most popular soccer video game franchise. More than 300 million copies have been sold since 1992. The game is currently the best-selling sports video game franchise with an average of over 50 million units sold per year.
